A comparative study of the effects of two administration methods on the albendazole efficacy against Taenia solium metacestodes in pigs. Taenia solium cysticercosis is a zoonosis causing serious health problems in developing countries. This study was carried out in calves infected with T. solium metacestodes to evaluate the efficacy of a single oral dose of albendazole (ALB) administered either by gastric tube or oro-gastric tube. Ten pigs with T. solium metacestodes were randomly divided into two groups of five pigs each and fed either 10 or 15 mg/kg b.w. of ALB in a single oral dose either by gastric tube or oro-gastric tube. The pigs were euthanized 30 days later and the efficacy of the treatment evaluated by counting the number of viable metacestodes remaining in the tissue. Albendazole given orally by gastric tube resulted in 99.2% efficacy against T. solium metacestodes, whereas the oral administration of ALB by oro-gastric tube achieved 87.5% efficacy. Both methods resulted in the expulsion of metacestodes from the tissues. The albendazole efficacy was significantly higher after administration by oro-gastric tube ($p=0.02$). The study concluded that the oral administration of ALB by oro-gastric tube is
